Investigators with Chestnut Health Systems' Lighthouse Institute conducted a randomized controlled trial to evaluate the effectiveness of SBIRT plus recovery management checkups for primary care (RMC-PC) compared to SBIRT only. The study findings reinforce the critical role of primary care in identifying and intervening with alcohol and other substance-related problems, and in providing continuous support to improve treatment and recovery outcomes.

CMS' New Behavioral Health Model Illustrates Ongoing Effort To Push Value-Based Care, Integration Forward

The model will connect adults with mental health conditions or substance use disorders (SUDs) to physical, behavioral and social supports, prioritizing a collaborative care model between behavioral health and physical health providers. The model also goes in the opposite direction of most integration programs. Instead of integrating behavioral health in physical care settings, the IBH Model calls for physical health and social support to be integrated into behavioral health, an idea becoming increasingly common in the mainstream of health care.

Anxiety and depression is spiking among young people. No one knows why.

Desperate to help record numbers of children suffering anxiety and depression, state and local governments are testing new interventions to get to the root of the crisis — even if they don't know what that is. “It is really hard to suss out which of these tools and new little bobbles is really delivering clinically meaningful benefit,” said Julia Harris, who works on the Bipartisan Policy Center's initiative.

Caring for Your Mental Health While Leading

Recent data from the Workforce Institute at UKG found that for 69 percent of people, managers had more impact on employee mental health than their therapist (41 percent) or doctor (51 percent), which is about equal to the effects of a domestic partner. But, for that impact to be positive, leaders must first address their own mental health needs.
